Ame damnée —A lost soul, a hopeless individual, a mere drudge or parasite.

* This phrase is applied in France to sayings or doings which are without motive The expression is said to have arisen in the time of Francis I when a suitor who had been "deboute" (from the Low Latin "debotare," to decide adversely) told the King by mistake that he had been "debotté." This led to the aboli tion of pleading in Latin, much to the displeasure of the barristers, who accordingly used this phrase to imply insufficient m-tive or reason ^{† &}quot;Quoth the Merteine," an imaginary author of proverba. In the old English as well as the old French collections of proverbs, it was usual to put them into the mouth of an imaginary person age. A survival of this custom is recorded by David Lloyd (1622 1691), who states that Sir Henry Washington (of the same family as George Washington) was so distinguished for his bravery in the Civil War, on the Royalist side, that it became a proverb when a difficulty arose . "Away with it, quoth Washington."

Every man is either a fool or a physician after thirty years of age (R.)

This originated in a saying attributed to the Emperor Tiberius, who died A D 37, aged seventy seven The authorities are as follow, and it will be seen that they are con-tradictory—

"I have heard that Tiberius used to say that that man was ridiculous, who, after stry years, appealed to a physician "—Plutarch. De Sanitate tuenda, Vol 2

"He (Tiberius) was wont to mock at the arts of physicians, and at those who, after thirty years of age, needed counsel as to what was good or bad for their bodies."

Tacitus Annals, Book 6, chap. 46

The version of Tacitus is corroborated by Suctonius ("Tiberius," chap 68), who states the emperor was accustomed to have the most unfailing good health, "so that from the age of thirty, he ruled himself according to his own judgment, without the help or advice of the physicians".
